

Let's all go radio again!

Do you miss the radio days? Well, radio might be the next big thing... in nanotechnology. Researchers from the University of California have constructed a wireless radio detector from carbon nanotubes. The device was used to transmit AM music wirelessly from an iPod to a speaker several feet away. This work might impact the construction of wireless Communications Systems at the nanoscale. Read more here.

T. S. Mayor